DECLINE IN COAL INDUSTRY

Is it not high time that the position of the mining industry in Great Britain was soberly and seriously considered as a matter of grave national interest? As Mr. Braun stated in yesterday's parliamentary debates, there has been a marked decrease in demand for British coal from certain importing countries, including France and Scandinavia, which currently have large stocks due to heavy imports from other countries. As a result, export prices have fallen.

former economic position. In addition, the discovery of untapped coal deposits in other parts of the world and the increasing use of hydropower for electricity are threats to the mining industry. Italy, in particular, is making significant progress in these areas with the official backing of the government. New plants and power stations are being built on a large scale which
